

Supplement

1. Searches:

We determined whether videos were considered relevant to “guns” or “firearms” if any content in the title, description, or tags matched this regular expression (note that ‘\y’ represents a word boundary to the Postgres database we used):

`\ygun\y|\yguns\y|\yfirearm\y|\yfirearms\y|\yshooting\y|\yammo\y|\yammunition\y|\yrifle\y|\ypistol\y|\yshotgun\y|\yrevolver\y|\yautocannon\y|\yactive shooter\y'`

AND if none of the text matched this regular expression (to exclude videos that are popular culture icons but not directly related to firearms and gun culture):

`'top gun/god family and guns/roses/kelly/glue/staple/nail/heat gun/gloves up/massage/shooting star/outdoor shooting/shooting for/basketball shooting/shooting video/shooting to/trouble shooting/shooting outside/yarrow\y/shooting guard/tape gun/smoke gun/smoking gun/impact gun/bullet train/black rifle coffee/bullet journal/shotgun red/thera/photo/\ycum\y/shooting up/bullet point/shooting pain/video shooting/caulk/paint gun/shotgun mic/signal gun/clothespin gun'`

Searches relevant to “firearm safety” matched the regular expression query: `'safe|training\\|yclass\\|y|permit|license|prevent'`. Searches relevant to “firearm policy” matched the query: `'law|control|bill|legal'`. To identify searches relevant to other firearm topics, we coded 250 unsupervised clusters of these search terms for relevance to firearm harm or injury. Specifically, we embedded the terms using a pretrained sentence transformer. Using an a priori objective of 400 searches per cluster, we clustered the resulting vectors into 250 clusters using R’s kmeans procedure.

2. Analyses:

The goal of this research was to extract the naturally occurring patterns of content consumption across tens of thousands of distinct searches and YouTube videos without a priori assumptions about what kinds of firearms content was important to users or why. A social network like the one we constructed with YouTube channels represents content similarity not by what we the researchers perceive in the content but by what different channel content naturally attracts users with different interests.

The analytic tools were chosen to allow identification of real-world patterns of YouTube observation and internet searches, unbiased by a priori theories; these methods are common in analyses of large datasets from online media (Sinnenberg, L., Buttenheim, A. M., Padrez, K., Mancheno et al., 2017) and (McCallum, A., Nigam, K., & Ungar, L. H., 2000). A social network like the one we constructed with YouTube channels represents content similarity not by what we the researchers perceive in the content, but by what different channel content naturally attracts users with different interests.

The goal of k-means unsupervised clustering is to identify patterns in data by looking for (k) number of centers of clusters in a pre-existing dataset, with the goal of minimizing the distance between data points and their centers. This machine learning technique iteratively examines different potential clustering; it stops when the clusters have become stable, and when the distance between data points and their centers are minimized. (Kuhn, M., & Johnson, K., 2013).

To make the network tractable or understandable, we employed a community detection algorithm (fastgreedy, in this case) to break it into the most densely connected ecosystems of content. A community detection algorithm splits a network into ecosystems each of which contains many channels that are closely linked to each other (by many shared audience members or users) and relatively unconnected to content in other ecosystems. These ecosystems aren't islands - they are still related to each other - but the distances within ecosystems are shorter than the distances between ecosystems. The result of all this statistical combination and partitioning is knowledge of the most prevalent kinds of content, knowledge of the most prevalent channels or media properties within those kinds, and knowledge of who (by age, race and gender) is most interested in each kind. The fast-greedy clustering procedure was specifically chosen to increase efficiency, especially given the noisiness and high potential rate of errors in this real-world dataset. (Petukhov, A., & Kozlov, I., 2013).

Regarding the internet searches, we clustered searches too to reduce more than 100,000 distinct search events to a comprehensible set of topics. Manual topic coding of corpora this size is infeasible, so we reduced the corpus to 250 representative topics. We turned each search phrase into a set of numbers using a deep learning model (a process called embedding using this widely used set of models) trained to represent millions of different words, sentences, and phrases using a common numeric vocabulary. Then we reduced all those numeric vectors to 250 distinct clusters or groups of searches that were relatively close to each other (we used the kmeans algorithm for clustering here, which just looks for groups of searches with similar locations). The result is mini-topics of searches that share keywords, and, critically, are coherent and small enough that humans can code examples from the clusters to generalize to the whole topic.
